After an hour of answering multiple-choice questions, you'll have two hours to write three essays: A synthesis essay in which you use sources to argue your point of view on a given issue. An analytical essay that examines, interprets, and explains the meaning and structure of prose passage. An argumentative essay that supports, refutes, or qualifies an opinion expressed in a statement or brief passage. Before you're given the signal to begin writing your essays, you'll have 15 minutes to read the questions and the sources for the synthesis essay. However, you don't have to spend the whole time reading. During those 15 minutes you can plan your essay, underline noteworthy ideas, formulate a tentative thesis, or prepare a brief outline. You might even glance at the other essay questions. Essentially, the time is yours to fill as you wish but with one exception: you may not start writing your essay. That begins only after the proctor gives you the green light. Write the essays in any order. The choice is yours. The suggested writing time for each essay is 40 minutes.###ARTICLEthe importance of developing one's ability to create a cohesive argument in the AP English Language Exam. The exam consists of three free response questions, including the synthesis essay, rhetorical analysis essay, and argumentative essay.
