Lost in the Haze of Emotional Turmoil You seem so charming, but I think I could eat an entire lifetime of your manias. I don't want to find out what you're capable of, but I'm drawn to it like a moth to flame. You're like a narrative that's unfolding before me, with scenes of dressing and undressing that leave me breathless. Is this how you always behave? People abandoning you without warning? You seem so lonely, young, and vulnerable, like someone who's been hurt one too many times. And when I say you're charming, I mean it in the way a strawberry is sweet - there's something sharp, tart, and red about you that I want to explore. I could hear your presence from afar, but I hid by hiding behind my own fears. You were talking loudly, drunk on words, and I was too self-conscious to respond. But when we finally connected, I felt like I'd discovered a secret flavor that no one else knew about - you're sweet, but also somehow bitter. You wept, and for a moment, I thought it was just a mood thing. But then you said I tasted like pain to you, and I realized that maybe, just maybe, I'm more complicated than I thought. So I left, and instead of sleeping in my bed, I crashed in a parking lot. We're two broken-down people who are holding on to each other, like old friends finding comfort in the noise of a car's radio. You raised red flags from the start, but I couldn't look away - you're like a dopplering, dropped slur that's impossible to ignore. And all I can think is that I want to taste your manias, even if it means risking my own heart.
